Figure 2.4: Tracing an image to make a graphic pattern Photoshop also comes with a wide variety of additional tools, as well as comprehensive support for layer-based selection and editing. Although this book focuses on layer-based editing, Photoshop is more than just a tool for producing graphics. As I mention in Chapter 6: The Power of GIMP, it is a raster graphics editor with a feature set that is somewhat similar to Photoshop.

Q: Are the mains 50Hz or 60Hz? I seem to remember that the waveform of mains electricity is 60Hz, as in the kitchen and mains plugs. The main cables that come into my walls is 50Hz as in the UK. So is the mains 50Hz or 60Hz? I'm wondering because the device connected to my new setup is a Timer module based on the 433MHz frequency, which uses a transistor to either pull the frequency higher or lower based on the battery voltage. It's supposed to be in fact a unipolar amplifier, just in case I'm wrong. A: The AC power cord that comes with a lot of things (computer, microwave, etc.) has a standard which is 50Hz, the kind that comes from your wall. The sort of radio emissions you are seeing is the kind of AC waveform your TV makes when it is on. The sort of radio emissions that your garage door opener generates is typically a 60Hz waveform. A: 60 Hz is probably the most common. When you're looking at the waveform you've got your TV's backlight on the 3rd harmonic. TVs also generally use 50Hz. I can't tell from your diagram if your device is an inverter or an inverter/step-up converter. From Wikipedia: High-voltage equipment (e.g. power substations) Using a 60 Hz waveform provides several advantages over a 50 Hz waveform. A 60 Hz waveform allows the equipment to carry more current per structure (resulting in less size) At 60 Hz, the amount of reactive current in the transmission line is less than at 50 Hz. This makes it easier for the equipment to withstand lightning strikes Source: The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office has granted Apple a patent for a new magnet-based motion sensor that could be found in the company's upcoming iWatch. Apple's device is set to be unveiled this year and include a plethora of features, one of which is a magnet-based motion sensor that could supposedly measure the user's movement and alert him to situations like when it's time to move to the gym or when he's late to an appointment. The patent describes a new magnet-based motion sensor featuring unique "test magnet arrays
