Contrast-enhanced carotid artery magnetic resonance angiography: performance in atherosclerotic cervical carotid artery disease. To test the hypothesis that stenotic atherosclerotic lesions in internal carotid arteries (ICAs) have a high-signal intensity core, which can be detected and quantified on magnetic resonance (MR) images. The study was approved by the local institutional review board and written informed consent was obtained. Seven patients were prospectively imaged with a short TI inversion recovery (STIR) sequence for evaluation of the time-signal intensity curve during contrast administration. Forty-two contrast-enhanced carotid MR studies were performed on three occasions in 17 patients with atherosclerotic ICAs, and in 25 control subjects. The patients' symptomatic ICA stenoses ranged from 30% to 99%. In six of these patients, the ipsilateral carotid occlusion was not detectable. The presence of a high-signal intensity (HI) core with a concomitant "double-end cap" and a time-signal intensity curve consistent with flow-related enhancement was observed in all 42 carotid MR studies. There were a statistically significant correlation between the percentage of stenosis and the HI core in the ICA ( $P < .01$ ) and the diameter of the extracranial carotid arteries ( $P < .01$ ). The average size of the HI core was  $1.5 \pm 0.1$  mm in the
